THE STORY OF THE EGYPTIAN TROUBLES.

No. 7.

a rule, however beneficial to the majority, was sure to be distasteful to the old governing classes, who found their occupation gone, and all their chances of speculation and plunder. And these men have friends and retainers to whom they can appeal, and a Mahometan population which may be influenced. It must have been self-evident to every ruler of experience that, if a protectorate was to exist, a force would be required to keep the disaffected classes in check. But instead of being checked, Arabi Pasha has been allowed to eject the Control from Egypt.

What real control Arabi Pasha has over the army, and what is the value of that army, remain to be seen. The troops have been organized by American officers, of whom the principal is Stone Pasha, chief of the staff, and observers speak well as a rule of its appearance. The Egyptian troops sent to aid Turkey in the last Russian war appear to have been a by no means worthless contribution, although national jealousy prevented their being utilized as they might have been, or thanked as they ought. Colonel Valentine Baker, in his narrative of the war, speaks in high terms of the men, and says that they were smarter cleaner, more active and better drilled, than some of the Turkish battalions. They particularly distinguished themselves against the enemy in the battle of Rarabassankoi, and contributed not a little to the success of the day. M'Coan, in his Egypt As It Is, says:—"As now organized the regular army consists of 18 regiments of infantry (two of which are black regiments from the Soudan), of four regiments of field artillery of six batteries each. Although not more than 20,000 men may now be with the colors, the regimental cadres are kept up for an army of 80,000 men. The infantry is armed with Remington rifles, the cavalry partly with revolver and lance, and partly with sabre and carbine; the field artillery with 100 Krupp and 50 smooth-bore guns. The chief weakness of the Egyptian army, however, is its still defective organization." It may be questioned also whether it has commanders who could lead it into the field against competent European generals. Much of the praise bestowed upon the troops seems to be relative. They are described as "creditable," but it is as native troops and not as European regulars.

The area of Egypt proper, the Delta Egypt, is estimated to comprise 210,000 square miles, with a population of 5,517,000 souls. But the annexed and conquered districts, including Darfur, the Soudan, &c., bring the totals up to 1,406,250 square miles, with a population of 17,000,000. When the census was taken (1878) there were 79,696 foreigners in Egypt of the following nationalities:

Greeks	34,000
French	17,000
Italians	13,906
Austrians	6,300
English	6,000
Germans	1,100
Other countries	1,390

In 1880 the imports from Great Britain were £3,060,640 and the exports to Great Britain were £9,190,589. But the great British interest in Egypt is in connexion with the Suez Canal. The tonnage passing through the canal annually is now over three millions and a quarter per annum, and more than three-fourths of the traffic since the opening of the canal belongs to Great Britain. In the year 1879 there passed through the canal 1,144 British vessels, and 93 belonging to France, 61 to the Netherlands, 51 to Italy, 40 to Austria, to Spain 25, and to Italy 16, the remainder being distributed among other nationalities. It is said that owing to the peculiarities of its construction among sand-banks, any body of men, such as a company of sappers and miners, could wreck the canal in 12 hours so that it could not be repaired for many months.—(Concluded.)
